Superintendent Ronald Fuller welcomed school counselors, educators and company representatives to the "Lunch and Learn" session at Stryker's state-of-the-art facility on Sprinkle Road. Fuller pointed out that there are about 400 skilled labor jobs available in the region for qualified candidates. The dilemma, as Neilitz, spoke during a recent session at Stryker Instruments, is a dearth of workers. "Machining is alive and well," said Fuller. "The roadblock is finding the workers.

"They're looking for self-starter people. If you're not self-motivated, you're not going to make it. It’s a dirty job. It’s an environment of learning and..." Fuller handed over the keys from the old Juvenile Home.

"We need help," Mark Welch of Flowserve Corp., told Kalamazoo County educators and school counselors. Welch was among representatives of four area manufacturing companies who spoke during a recent meeting hosted by Stryker Instruments to focus on the growing need for qualified skilled trades workers. The session, led by Stryker Instruments Production Supervisor Jeremy Neilitz, was attended by Shaena Johnson of Parker Hannifin, Dave Mauer of Humphrey Products, and Welch from Flowserve; a tour of the Stryker Instruments plant; and one-on-one discussions with machinists and other skilled trades employees. Kalamazoo RESA Superintendent Ronald Fuller welcomed school counselors, educators and company representatives to the "Lunch and Learn" session at Stryker's state-of-the-art facility on Sprinkle Road. Fuller pointed out that there are about 400 skilled labor jobs available in the region for qualified candidates. The dilemma, as Neilitz, spoke during a recent session at Stryker Instruments, is a dearth of workers. "Machining is alive and well," said Fuller. "The roadblock is finding the workers.

"They're looking for self-starter people. If you're not self-motivated, you're not going to make it. It’s a dirty job. It’s an environment of learning and..." Fuller handed over the keys from the old Juvenile Home.

"We need help," Mark Welch of Flowserve Corp., told Kalamazoo County educators and school counselors. Welch was among representatives of four area manufacturing companies who spoke during a recent meeting hosted by Stryker Instruments to focus on the growing need for qualified skilled trades workers. The session, led by Stryker Instruments Production Supervisor Jeremy Neilitz, was attended by Shaena Johnson of Parker Hannifin, Dave Mauer of Humphrey Products, and Welch from Flowserve; a tour of the Stryker Instruments plant; and one-on-one discussions with machinists and other skilled trades employees. Kalamazoo RESA Superintendent Ronald Fuller welcomed school counselors, educators and company representatives to the "Lunch and Learn" session at Stryker's state-of-the-art facility on Sprinkle Road. Fuller pointed out that there are about 400 skilled labor jobs available in the region for qualified candidates. The dilemma, as Neilitz, spoke during a recent session at Stryker Instruments, is a dearth of workers. "Machining is alive and well," said Fuller. "The roadblock is finding the workers.

"They're looking for self-starter people. If you're not self-motivated, you're not going to make it. It’s a dirty job. It’s an environment of learning and..." Fuller handed over the keys from the old Juvenile Home.